DIRECTOR'S NOTE

We are glad to return you to the world of the spaghetti western for this second chapter in our trilogy; if you weren't with us for the first show, don't despair. They are connected by the central character, and a shared ethos, but not any sense of linear plot. The spaghetti westerns were shambling, rambling, gambling films, their narratives cobbled together by a multi-national group of filmmakers in front of and behind the camera, and the ragtag nature of their stories appealed to us. Such loose structure allowed us the freedom to change the style for this second story; it's more of a conspiratorial mystery set within the spaghetti western world, a turn from the caper feel of the first chapter. Our hero, called William Campbell in the previous show and now known as Biitei (the Arapahoe word for Ghost, which the other characters call him), is a different, more taciturn man than he was last time out, more in the tradition of Eastwood's Man With No Name. Thanks for the kind words after the last show, if you were with us. It helps us greatly in crafting this and the third chapter premiering this fall to know that you support what we do. By the way, sorry we killed Diamond Joe.
