DIRECTOR'S NOTE

The Lady Eve was originally filmed in 1941 written and directed by the great Preston Sturges. This film full of innuendos and smart dialogue, drops hints about how the beginning of the second world war was starting to seep into American consciousness, but at the same time was a feel good romp that lets the audience forget their cares for a while. Sturges was one of the few writers to break into directing during this period and had a series of golden rules that he stuck to in his writing. "A pretty girl is better than plain one, a leg is better than an arm, a bedroom is better than a living room, and a prat fall is better than anything." I hope you enjoy our adaptation of The Lady Eve.
